From the State Archivist

On April 2, 2012, images of the 1940 federal census will be released by the National Archives and Records Administration. People 72 years of age and older will be able to find themselves as children on the population schedules.

Others may find their ancestors in America for the first time after they successfully fled from the growing war in Europe. More will discover family members getting on their feet again as the Great Depression drew to a close. Many will find relatives living near their extended families for the last time before they moved away as part of our increasingly mobile society.

For each individual enumerated, the expected location, name, relationship, description, education, nativity and citizenship information will be available. If the person lived in a different location in 1935, the 1940 census serves as a bonus census, also listing where they resided on April 1, 1935. The information in the occupation and income columns will be of particular interest to researchers considering the economic challenges of the time.

Yet even with all this wonderful information, there is one catch. When released, there will be no name index. With 132,164,569 people counted by the census and 3,784,664 alone in the nation's tenth largest state of Missouri, it will be some time before one will be available. Researchers who do not want to wait until a name index is available should begin to prepare now, so they can more easily find their ancestors when the census is released.

The 1940 census is arranged by enumeration district rather than name or address. The genealogical website stevemorse.org/census/index is working to create an index that will link street addresses to enumeration districts in the largest cities, thus easing access to the records when they are released. Currently, Cape Girardeau, Hannibal, Independence, Jefferson City, Joplin, Kansas City, Sedalia, Springfield, St. Joseph, St. Louis, University City, and Webster Groves have been finished. Columbia and Kirkwood await completion. Addresses from the period may be found on family correspondence and postcards, city directory and phonebook listings, World War II military draft and service records and even the 1930 census. For those who died at the same address, the Missouri death certificates on our website may also provide address information.

For those with ancestors living in other locales other than the major cities, the same site also provides keyword-searchable descriptions for Missouri's rural townships and smaller towns as well as links to detailed enumeration district maps. These maps show the rural roads of the time, as well as marking the exact locations of rural homes, churches and schools.

In many ways, research in the 1940 census will be no different than any other archival record series. Planning, preservation, and access are essential to success. The staff members of the Missouri State Archives stand ready to assist in every way we can.

Sincerely,

John Dougan
State Archivist

Great Missouri Treasure Hunt Winners Announced

From June to October 2011, the Missouri State Archives held its largest outreach program ever, a contest to find Missouri's greatest historical treasures. The Great Missouri Treasure Hunt was designed to not only promote the collections of the Archives, but also the rich resources found in historical records repositories statewide and even in the attics of everyday Missourians. The contest invited participants to submit stories, photographs, videos, and documents sharing what they discovered about their own family or community through the state's historical records.

Libraries, historical societies, state parks, and museums from across the state joined the hunt by submitting entries and promoting the contest to their users through posters, mailers and a special Missouri History Record newspaper filled with fun facts about Missouri history, trivia and games. Still, outreach for the contest did not stop there. Staff of the Missouri State Archives visited community centers and the state fair to promote the contest by offering preservation tips and scanning records for the public. A special website was designed that included the contest rules and entry form, a directory of institutions where treasure could be found and descriptions of the Archives and its primary collections. In addition, a Great Missouri Treasure

Hunt Facebook page was created with daily posts that encouraged the involvement of Missourians in their state's history, including featured documents from the Archives, staff profiles, genealogy tips, videos of staff explaining their Missouri treasures, preservation tips and contests in which friends of the hunt could win one of more than 100 prizes. A Flickr group was also created, where everyone could share photographs related to Missouri's past.

The stories shared in the contest were often touching and passed down through families for generations. For example, one entrant located the school where a female slave from whom she had descended received an education contrary to state law. Another was able to verify the circumstances of an ancestor's untimely death after he tried to remain neutral during the Civil War but was unable to do so. One family had long cherished a letter from President Abraham Lincoln to Missouri Governor Thomas Clement Fletcher, dated February 20, 1865, discussing the violent divisions in Missouri and the state's guerrilla warfare, while another family saved the pen used by the last lieutenant governor of Upper Louisiana to sign the document transferring the land from Spain to France and then to the United States in the Louisiana Purchase.

Contest entries were accepted in three categories: Family History, Missouri History and Civil War History, in recognition of the war's sesquicentennial. Any photographs submitted were also eligible for selection as the "Best Photograph." Finalists were selected by a committee of staff members, but the public was the final judge. Individuals from across the nation and four other countries voted online for their favorites. In the end, four Missourians walked away with a veritable treasure trove of prizes donated by history-minded businesses and nonprofit organizations. Some of the prizes included a hotel stay near the Family History Library in Salt Lake City, a family portrait session using Civil War-era tintype photography, numerous books on Missouri history, digitization of old home movies and records preservation supplies. In addition, winners were able to earn a place in history for themselves by being featured in the Official Manual of the State of Missouri: 2011-2012, a statewide government publication required by state statute and permanently retained by the Archives.

Jan Wenk of Crestwood, Missouri won the Family History category with her search for more information on an ancestor who worked as a steamboat engineer on the Mississippi River. Wenk discovered beautiful illustrations of the 1850s St. Louis riverfront at the Missouri History Museum, and, much to her surprise, one of the pictorial maps included the Ocean Spray, a paddle wheel steamboat on which her great-great grandfather served as second engineer. According to a New York Times article from the time, the Ocean Spray was lost in a highly publicized racing accident that resulted in her ancestor's engineer license being revoked.

The winner of the Missouri History category was Barbara Placht of New Haven, Missouri. Placht told the story of a Farmall F-20 tractor purchased by her grandfather in 1937 to replace a team of mules on the family farm. Placht's grandfather designed a mechanical dozer attachment for the tractor that helped him and his neighbors build terraces and conserve agricultural ground after the effects of the 1930s Dust Bowl. Inspired by the indomitable spirit of Depression-era Missourians fighting to provide for their families, Placht and her relatives decided to restore the tractor after it had been left for decades in a field to rust. Today, the tractor is fully functioning once again.

Bill Stine, a resident of Jefferson City, Missouri, won the Civil War History category. Stine shared the saga of his great granduncle Union Army Private Fredrick Buehrle, who marched with famed German-American General Franz Sigel and participated in two of Missouri's most significant battles – the Battle of Carthage and the Battle of Wilson's Creek. Buehrle fell ill and passed away after getting wet while marching in a Civil War veteran's parade in 1915. His military funeral was one of the largest ever seen in the capital city, equaled only by that of Governor John Sappington Marmaduke, a former Confederate major general.

A historic snapshot of a turn-of-the-century home in Ashland, Missouri was named "Best Photograph." Contributed by Kimberly Ponder of Columbia, Missouri, the image captured a home that has long since been demolished, including a grass-roofed outbuilding that was likely used for drying tobacco, a reminder of one of the area's once most lucrative cash crops. According to residents of Ashland, the home was once used as a boarding house for young teachers and even had a room devoted to making brooms.

More information on the Great Missouri Treasure Hunt and its winners can be found at www.greatmissouritreasurehunt.com. The Missouri State Archives would like to thank the numerous individuals and organizations that participated in the hunt and helped make the discovery of treasure possible, especially the contest's sponsors. Sponsors of the hunt included Arcadia Publishing, FamilySearch, Federation of Genealogical Societies, Friends of the Missouri State Archives, Home Movie Depot, Missouri Life Magazine, Richmond Alternative Photography, University of Missouri Press and Weider History Group, with additional support provided by Family Tree Magazine, Hollinger Metal Edge and University Products.

Family Tree Magazine Recognizes Archives

The Missouri Digital Heritage (MDH) website was recognized in the December 2011 issue of Family Tree Magazine as one of the best state websites for family history research. This follows the magazine's earlier announcement of MDH as one of the best 101 national and international websites for genealogy research and one of ten state-of-the-art archives. This is the ninth year that the Missouri State Archives has been acknowledged by Family Tree Magazine, America's largest-circulation genealogy magazine.

MDH, a partnership between the Missouri State Archives and the Missouri State Library, makes historical documents from across the state available to the public through a single, searchable website. This collaborative effort assists local government and civic groups in digitizing their historical records for online access. Collections from the Archives, the State Library, and historical institutions from across the state are available online at www.missouridigitalheritage.com.

Family Tree Magazine applauded the presence of several key Archives collections on the Missouri Digital Heritage website: Naturalization Records, 1816-1955; Land Patent Records, 1820-1969; Birth and Death Records Database, Pre-1910; Missouri Death Certificates, 1910-1960; and Soldiers' Records: War of 1812-World War I. In addition, the magazine commended the Archives for the number of special collections, historic photographs, and newspapers that have recently been added to the site's records databases. Together, these collections make available more than 6.8 million documents detailing the lives of individual Missourians and the communities they called home.

The full list of Family Tree Magazine's 101 best family history websites is available at www.familytreemagazine.com/article/101-best-websites-2011. The 75 sites recently selected for their specialization in genealogy research for one of the 50 United States can be found at

Speaker Series Visits St. Louis

The Friends of the Missouri State Archives sponsors a regular series of monthly educational programming at the main branch of the Archives in Jefferson City. Over the years, the series has included historians, musicians, theatrical performers and even folk dancers. These presentations remain some of the most popular outreach programs held at the Archives. To provide this same opportunity to history lovers outside the mid-Missouri area, the series was taken on the road for the first time in October 2011.

In partnership with the Missouri History Museum, the Friends sponsored a presentation in St. Louis by Friends board member Bob Priddy. Priddy spoke on his new book The Art of the Missouri Capitol: History in Canvas, Bronze, and Stone. Written by Priddy and art historian Jeffrey Ball, the book explores the stories of not just the Capitol's art, but also the leading painters and sculptors employed to decorate the majestic building and the state commission responsible for overseeing their work. Priddy explored the political roadblocks that endangered the decoration of the Capitol, how those challenges were overcome by the commission charged with the Capitol's beautification and the controversial choices that had to be made by

Missouri's Earlier Battles for Freedom

The issues of slavery and freedom were not new to Missouri when the Civil War broke out in 1861. In fact, slaves had been fighting for their freedom in Missouri courts for many decades.

An 1807 Missouri territorial statute said that a person held in wrongful servitude could sue for freedom. Most of the people who used this law to gain freedom were enslaved Africans. Since the slaves' cases were all brought for the same reason, historians refer to them collectively as "freedom suits."

Suing for freedom was not easy. The 1807 statute had many requirements and outlined each step slaves had to take to win their freedom. Slaves had to prove they were free black persons and had been physically abused while being held as slaves.

The 1807 territorial statute was made part of Missouri law when the new state's laws were first published in 1824 and remained in effect until after the Civil War. The years between 1824 and 1844 are considered the "golden age" of freedom suits because of the number of slaves who won their freedom during those years. This golden age was the result of an 1824 decision by the Missouri Supreme Court that established the precedent of "once free, always free." The court decided that if a slave was taken to live in a territory or state where slavery was not allowed, the slave would become a free person, even if he or she later returned to a slave state.

Unfortunately, the golden age did not last forever. The most well-known freedom suit was filed in the St. Louis Circuit Court by Dred and Harriet Scott in 1846. Although the St. Louis court initially granted freedom to the Scotts, the Missouri Supreme Court denied their freedom in 1852, overturning the "once free, always free" precedent. The case was brought before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1857. The federal court decided to uphold the Missouri Supreme Court's ruling, reasoning that the Scotts were and should remain slaves because the U.S. Constitution did not recognize slaves as citizens. The Dred Scott decision fueled the ongoing debate over slavery and is considered one of the events that led to the Civil War.

Over 300 freedom suits can be found at Missouri State Archives-St. Louis, located in the Globe Building at Tucker Avenue. These case files were preserved and made available as part of the St. Louis Circuit Court Historical Records Project, a partnership between the Archives, Office of the Circuit Clerk, Washington University and numerous other area colleges and universities. Wolves in the Courthouse: Animal Bounties in Missouri

Linda Myers, Field Archivist

On July 25, 1877, George Boston entered the Greene County clerk's office carrying a gunny sack. From it he took the scalp of a wolf, ears dangling, and presented it to the county clerk. Signing an affidavit that he had killed the wolf inside the county, he surrendered the scalp. The county clerk stored it until the next meeting of the county court when a payment warrant was issued to Boston, allowing him to collect a bounty for killing the wolf.

Any human expansion into wilderness conflicts with natural species—whether flora or fauna. Such was certainly the case as Missourians moved westward from the initial settlement areas along the Mississippi River. Two indigenous wolf species, the gray and red wolf, preyed upon the domestic animals on which Missourians' survival depended. Shortly after statehood, as early as 1825 (and perhaps even prior), the legislature recognized the need to control predatory wildlife and began offering bounties for wolves. The proof of those kills was the scalps, with ears still attached. The importance of eradicating competing species was recognized in a caveat to another 1825 statute defining activities prohibited on the Sabbath-- excepted were "any person or persons who may hunt, shoot, or kill any wolf, panther, wild cat or other animal or fowl, which may in any way depredate upon or destroy any tame stock, growth or grain." Missourians viewed encroachments by wolves as personal affronts; contemporary accounts describe catching and skinning live wolves that had killed livestock.

Missouri's 1840 "An Act to Encourage the Destruction of Wolves" provided for payment of one dollar (the equivalent of around $26 in 2011) for wolf scalps, to be repaid to the county from the state treasury. Residents could petition the county court to raise the wolf bounty to a maximum of two dollars, though the county would bear the added expense. Bounty amounts and procedures changed over time, with dollar amounts being increased and payment shared by county and state, as well as safeguards to ensure that the same scalp was not submitted for payment more than once.

From the middle of the 19th century, the dwindling number of deer and other game animals in the state made Missourians aware of the need for preserving wild game as a resource.

In 1841, the state's first game law imposed restrictions on the hunting of white-tail deer, followed by various regulations on hunting and fishing that culminated in the 1936 creation of the Conservation Commission. Conservation of valuable wildlife was always viewed, however, as an issue distinctly apart from the destruction of nuisance animals, and the first significant change to bounty laws was made in 1909 when eligible animals were actually expanded. Counties could elect to offer rewards for the scalps or heads of gophers, moles, ground squirrels and chipmunks. State statutes in 1919, while providing for a State Game Protection Fund, the appointment of a Fish and Game Commissioner and identification of protected species, again expanded animal bounty laws to include hawks, eagles and horned owls. This was likely due to the growing importance of poultry within the state; penned chickens were “sitting ducks” for birds of prey. The 1929 statutory bounty allowances widened to include wild cats.

Bounties paid for predatory animals continued until the mid-20th century, documented in records kept by the county clerk. Clerks were required by statute to take and destroy the animal scalps or heads, administer an oath to the claimant attesting to where and when the animal had been killed, issue a certificate authenticating the claim and record all claims in a register. In a number of Missouri counties, the clerk’s register, as well as the certificates issued to hunters, can still be found. They document animal bounties paid from 1846 to as recently as 1970. Although the registers, usually identified as Wolf Scalp Registers or Bounty Registers, were created to verify claims paid from the county treasury, they document a time in the state’s history when attitudes toward wild animals were very different than ours, and not all wildlife was viewed as worth preserving—a time when, indeed, Missourians could not afford to live and let live.

Mobsters in our Midst: The Kansas City Crime Family

January 19, 2012, 7:00 p.m.

Organized crime formed part of the political, economic, and social fabric of Kansas City for much of the 20th century. The mob's power was never greater than in the three decades it was ruled by Nick Civella, Kansas City's longest-reigning mob boss. Mobsters in our Midst reveals the story of the rise and fall of Civella and his powerful crime family, as told by longtime Federal Bureau of Investigation agent Bill Ouseley. Concerted efforts by the FBI, local law enforcement, and Justice Department Strike Force prosecutors, along with the enactment of effective new laws and internal mob strife, led to unprecedented violence in the 1970s and 1980s and ultimately to the demise of the Civella mob rule. Ouseley will share never-before-published details of the crimes and investigations that brought down Civella and his cronies.

George Washington Carver: A Biography

February 16, 2012, 7:00 p.m.

In Recognition of African American History Month

Gary Kremer, executive director of the State Historical Society of Missouri, will chronicle the life of renowned African American scientist and teacher George Washington Carver, beginning with a discussion of the political and social circumstances in Missouri at the time that Carver was born into slavery. George Washington Carver: A Biography follows Carver through his formal education to his decision to accept Booker T. Washington's offer to teach and do research at the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. The focus is on Carver's career at Tuskegee and his major achievements, including his championing of crop rotation and the hundreds of products he created from peanuts, sweet potatoes, and other plants native to the South. Kremer portrays the famed scientist George Washington Carver as a brilliant, creative man, who nonetheless possessed very human peculiarities and frailties.

Dred & Harriet Scott: Their Family Story

March 22, 2012, 7:00 p.m.

In Recognition of Women's History Month

Like many Missouri slaves, Dred and Harriet Scott, a St. Louis couple, each sued for freedom in 1846 based on the time they had lived as slaves in free territory. When their cases were appealed to the Missouri Supreme Court, attorneys combined the separate freedom suits into a single case under Dred's name, resulting in Harriet's role being largely lost to history. The well-known case of Dred Scott eventually made it to the U.S. Supreme Court, where, on March 6, 1857, Dred Scott and his family were denied their freedom and the country was pushed a step closer to the Civil War. Ruth Ann Hager, a genealogist at the Special Collections Department of the St. Louis County Library, will explore how the Scott family finally secured their freedom and what happened to Harriet and the couple's daughters, Eliza and Lizzie, after Dred's death in 1858.
